Armenia's reputation was again enhanced by the operations of eight bachelors who recently visited the country, which is about a hundred miles from the capital of Armenia on the western slope of the Armenian Plateau. The bachelors were from the United States, members of the American University in Armenia, and were the first of a series of students who will be sent to the country as part of a program organized by the Armenian government in cooperation with the American University. The aim of the program is to increase the knowledge and understanding of Armenia among American students.

Armenia's status as a full member of the United Nations was recognized by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), which has granted the country observer status. The recognition is significant because it allows Armenia to participate in the work of international organizations and to contribute to the development of education and culture in the region.
